

It's Prince Charles, the all-round entertainer

The Prince of Wales shows George Osborne, the Chancellor, how to keep his act clean.

The Prince of Wales initiated the Campaign for Wool.

Showing George Osborne, the Chancellor, that it is possible to get laughs without turning the air blue, the Prince of Wales had his audience in stitches at the launch of Wool Modern, an exhibition for the Campaign for Wool at La Galleria in Pall Mall.

"I discovered a company that makes woollen coffins — coffins, ladies and gentlemen, to die for. They are well worth investigation," he joshed.

Of the two men who run the campaign, initiated by the prince, he observed: "I'm grateful to Nicholas Coleridge and John Thorley, I suppose you might call them the Ant and Dec of the wool world."

Of wool, he wisecracked: "The great thing about this is that you can eat what was the original owner of the fleece, wear it, sleep on it, insulate your house with it, and attempt unsuccessfully to set fire to it."

His parting words to his audience were: "I hope over the coming years, there will be ever more of you who will be proud to be just a little bit woolly."
